To Whom it May Concern,

At this time with the economical situation in Canada looking more dire by the day, and with Canadians already facing increasing financial burdens, now is not the time to increase rates of utilities. We are on the brink of a major recession with rising inflation. Canadians more now than ever are faced with decisions of feeding themselves, warming themselves, or finding other ways to cut costs. These costs are not on extras but on necessities that all Canadians need.

With reports of 60% or more Canadians reducing their food spending on necessary sustenance, resulting in cutting back on meals, or reducing the quality of food (which will impact their health and our already crumbling healthcare system) now is not the time pile on further costs to utilities that Canadians can't be without. It is unpatriotic to continue to step down on those who have no choice but to further put themselves in debt, go hungry, and go cold during our harsh winters.

This proceeding to increase gas prices further should not be considered.
