Raising rates on home heating and cooking fuel by what is essentially a monopoly to preserve and augment profit margins and dividend stability during a time of rapidly rising inflation and cost of living, without any tangible benefit or improvement of service or product, is asinine. If Enbridge were in any danger of becoming insolvent the conversation would be different, however every indication is that the company is still operating with a healthy bottom line. Providing an essential service to life and limb is not a place to wrest more profit.
