Let's face it! Natural gas distribution has become an essential service for most of the population. As the most common method of heating a home in this country, the supporting infrastructure has long been promoted to the point where it's difficult to find a house that doesn't have a forced-air gas furnace. Not everyone has the resources to change to an alternate method of heating a home ie. heat pump, geothermal, or hydro, for that matter. Many are having difficulty just feeding their families. So when I see Enbridge paying dividends consistently, buying up energy companies all over North America, and compensating their executives between 1 and 5 million dollars per year, I have to ask, is this really necessary? Gas rates are already too high.

Enbridge should do some soul-searching and look within to reduce its overhead instead of nickel and diming its captive customer base. I oppose the approval of this application.
