on the Canadian Special Operations Regiment. Two Canadian military cargo planes are so ferrying weapons to the Kurds.

The prime minister said the new deployment is not without risk, but it's not a combat mission, something for which the Conservatives have traditionally sought the blessing of parliament.

Indeed, both the Liberals and the NDP demanded that Parliament immediately be involved in examining and sanctioning Canada's military involvement in Iraq for fear of mission creep.

A spokesperson for the prime minister's office said opposition leaders are in the midst of the advance of ISIL or diminishing its long-term threat."

The allies are also considering further sanctions on Russia, which Canada fully supports, he added.

Despite being one of the harshest critics of President Vladimir Putin's actions, the prime minister was not part of a Thursday meeting with Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko convened by the U.S., Britain, Germany, Italy and France.

Harper later met separately with Poroshenko, French President Francois Hollande and British Prime Minister David Cameron, whose opening remarks on Friday underlined our allies can be assured and are assured that Canada will spend what is necessary."

NATO rolled out plans Friday to bolster its rapid reaction forces, which will be capable of deploying to countries under Russian threat within days. The alliance's military leaders are still working out the details, including a spearhead force of ultra-high readiness troops.

Harper made no immediate commitment to this effort, saying he has seen "very little in the way of detail." He said he wants to see plans take shape before deciding to spend money on them.

turned to Canada.

The RCMP is developing an "intervention program" that would engage police and local communities to deal with people at risk of turning to extremism, the report added.

In a letter to Blaney made public Friday, Easter said hearings on this "critically important issue" should happen on "an urgent basis" to examine key elements of the RCMP's intervention plan, why the program is being developed only now, and previous efforts to deal with the risk of radicalization.

Harper, Mulroney at it again after ex-PM's criticism

Stephanie Levitz

OTTAWA — What had been a renewed political friendship between Stephen Harper and Brian Mulroney could be back on the rocks.

The prime minister found himself offering up a defence Friday in the face of an onslaught of criticism from Mulroney over foreign affairs policy, Canada's relationship with the U.S. and Harper's public fight with the Supreme Court.

On the 30th anniversary of his historic majority election win this week, the 75-year-old Mulroney suggested the Tories weren't in step with Canadian traditions and history because of their strained relationship with the United Nations. He pointed to Canada's last failed bid for a seat on the Security Council as evidence of a bigger problem.

The former prime minister said the government's foreign affairs policy "has to be enveloped in a broader and more generous sweep that takes in Canadian traditions and Canadian history in a much more viable way. "We're in the big leagues ... we have to conduct ourselves in that way. We can't be outliers," he told CTV's "Power Play."

He also suggested the government had no clout internationally because the current prime minister has close ties to U.S. President Barack Obama. But in Wales for the NATO summit, Harper said Canada's ability to "contribute concretely in international affairs" has never been higher, "whether on the hard-powered side like the military, or the things we've been doing on development, particularly our leadership on child and maternal health."

Harper severed ties with Mulroney in 2007 over former prime minister's business dealings with a man lobbyist Karlheinz Schreiber.

Construction mogul says he gave former police boss $250,000

Canadian Press

MONTREAL — An ex-construction mogul dropped a bombshell at Quebec's corruption probe today, saying he gave $250,000 to help Montreal's top cop because he was in debt after losing a mayoral election.

Jacques Duchesneau immediately dismissed Accurso's comments as completely false. Duchesneau campaigned unsuccessfully against Pierre Bourque for the job of Montreal mayor in 1998 after four years as the city's police chief. Accurso testified at the Charbonneau Commission that he was approached by a man named Richard who was part of Duchesneau's entourage and set up a meeting between the two.

He said Duchesneau told him even his house was targeted because of his financial difficulties after a municipal election defeat.

"It's Mr. Duchesneau who asked for me," Accurso said. "He said, 'Listen, if you help me, I'll get on my feet somewhere and I'll remember.'" The ex-construction kingpin said he then handed over a cheque for $250,000 but that it was made to the name of Richard's company. Accurso did not remember the man's family name or company.
