I understand that companies are compelled to make more and more money, year over year, infinitely. You need to understand that we don't have infinite money to pay for this endeavour. You will hit a ceiling where people can't pay what you're asking, yet the number must go up. This is when you'll start tearing down infrastructure and worsening the service in order to meet your infinity goal. Rates will rise, service will drop, year over year, until we are all struggling to pay unaffordable rates for a massively deficient supply. It's all happened before, it'll all happen again. You can choose not to enter this cycle.
