I note that Enbridge seeks to increase its distribution rates from its current rate structure. I disagree strenuously with this application not on the basis that it will cost my household more as consumers but rather on the more fundamental issue of the currently accepted practice of separating distribution from consumption fees. Such a regressive practice fails completely to incentivize reduced consumption. Under this arrangement, consumption has a negligible effect on billing. Additionally, guaranteeing distribution fees shields the company from business realities - an antiquated protectionist approach.
